

THERE'S A WORM IN OUR MOUTH~

RETICULAR ADJECTIVES ABOUND...

...for subterranean networked meshiness—rhizomatic, mycorrhizal, mycelial, etc. We (Kathy + Ryan) have been in an extended hyphal conversation that has you into our thought-made worms of us as we sift and stir through a rich mix of word dirt, tracing filaments and connections and symbiotic entanglements. Writing to you now, from our respective homes (Ryan in Phoenix [Akimel O'odham/Pee-posh Lands] and Kathy in Providence [Narragansett Lands]), we're excited to invite you into our thought-extended hyphal conversation that has made worms of us as we sift and stir through a rich mix of word dirt, tracing filaments and connections and symbiotic entanglements. and "digital."

Our many vermi-hearts have been yearning for multilingual reading/writing beyond the book spread-beyond binaries such as verso (left) and recto (right), beyond the tidy splits of "origin" and "destination" language, and beyond the partition of "physical" and "digital."

OUR INSPIRATIONS ↗

We'd like to offer a detritivorous accompaniment to your reading. Visit the browser link in the worm crawl through a subterranean swirl of text taken from our various drafts and brainstorming in preparation for this "essay," including screenshot-ed comments, handwritten notes, and wriggling We've inherited certain choices as "correct" or "default"—we're curious about how to make these defaults visible as choices while also imagining what other possibilities might exist. Of course, there is no single answer, but rather many, many answers, some which offer new questions.

Across our (still unfurling) conversations we've been circling (like an asymptotic dog about to sit but never quite sitting) a series of questions about how languages can co-habit space in multilingual texts.

We're inspired by people and projects that move away from the "book" as a singular, asks questions about materiality, and accessibility, and embodiment: Bojana Coklyat and Finnegan WORLD ~~~ Amy Suo Wu's Collier Nagues' project Poetry ~~~ Chia The Ground I Stand On Is Not My Ground.

We're indebted to poet-translator-artists who shift our focus from grieving what is "lost" in translation toward celebrating the poetic and political possibilities of indeterminacy: Sawako Nakayasu's Say Translation is Art (it is!) ~~~ Antena Aire, Eleana Hofer + Jadeine Pluecker's "Language Justice and Language experimentation collaborative" ~~~ Kameelah Janan Rasheed's attention towards language's porosity and "leakiness."

WELCOME TO THE SWIRL:)

HEALTHY SOIL

...depends on resource cycling, bioturbation, and interconnection. In our work, individually and collectively, we're interested in learning from life that exists in this zone of exchange, transformation, and mutual dependence. Like worms, we hope to immerse ourselves in what nourishes and moves us. To let it move through us, and to then let that reciprocal movement yield opportunities for those around us to be nourished in turn. We hope our sharing can serve as a beginning to new experiments, collaborations, and correspondences. If you'd like to be in touch, feel free to reach out by email at not-a-press@proton.me. Until then, Kratyahny

We're grateful to Yaxkin Melchy for his humusy writings which have inspired our worms!

DIVE IN~ THE WORM WIDE WEB

tinyurl.com/worms-inside